the same time, the fact that the two countries have similar political systems and similar political culture may have contributed to the similar results.

It is interesting to note that the results of the present study are similar to those of the study by Wong and Chan (2001) on the political participation of Hong Kong citizens.

There are several limitations of the present study. First, the sample size is small.

Second, the study is cross-sectional. It is possible that the results may be different if the study were longitudinal.

Third, the study is based on self-reported data. It is possible that the results may be different if the study were based on objective data.

Fourth, the study is based on a convenience sample. It is possible that the results may be different if the study were based on a random sample.

Fifth, the study is based on a single country. It is possible that the results may be different if the study were based on multiple countries.

Finally, the study is based on a single time point. It is possible that the results may be different if the study were based on multiple time points.

Conclusion

The present study has shown that the political participation of Hong Kong citizens is similar to that of Chinese citizens. This finding is important because it suggests that the political culture of Hong Kong is similar to that of China.
